Dr. Scott,

Colin Donohue joined our pool of free-lancers two years ago and immediately separated himself from the others in terms of talent and initiative. At the end of the first night Colin wrote for us, I got an e-mail from the person heading the Sports desk that night. It only needed four words: More Colin Donohue, please.

Colin has demonstrated to me in the two years he's helped us that he prides himself in being a thorough and thoughtful professional. That he pushes to do more and always takes the lead in doing the most research leading into an assignment lets me think he'd be an outstanding leader. He's never satisfied with good, always seeking to find different ways to do things so they can be better.

When I look to hire people, those are the traits I like to see. Talent is important, and make no mistake, he has talent. So do a lot of people. But his energy and his attention to detail set him apart.

As you go through the hiring process, I would encourage you to give him a chance, listen to what he has to say, get an idea of how he thinks. I think you'll find someone who would fit what you're looking for.

Thanks for taking the time to read this unsolicited recommendation. I hope you'll give Colin consideration for your vacancy.
